

surveillance backdoors for all internet communications would impose too big a burden to the technology providers, and raise too many concerns as to the security of the communications channels to non-governmental interception. Therefor, broadband and VoIP providers should not have to open their networks and software up to law enforcement agencies.